

Oxford Observatory Opens the Door to the Night Sky

From school students to lifelong stargazers, the Oxford Observatory continues to inspire curiosity about the universe while bringing astronomy education to the wider community.

Mātakitaki ki te Raki, the Oxford Area School Observatory, has been helping locals explore the night sky since opening in 2006. Run entirely by volunteers, the observatory is home to two powerful Meade Schmidt Cassegrain telescopes, a high-powered binocular station, and a growing calendar of public events and workshops.

Based at Oxford Area School, the observatory focuses strongly on astronomy education for students and the wider community alike. Open nights, Matariki morning viewing sessions, private bookings, and hands-on workshops give visitors the chance to experience planets, stars, the Moon, and space in a unique and accessible way. Workshops range from beginner sessions through to astrophotography and advanced astronomy topics.

Recently, the observatory celebrated its 20th year anniversary with a special free public open night on May 30, welcoming the community to experience the facility and learn more about the night sky.

The observatory continues to offer regular sessions throughout the winter season (April-September) and encourages locals to stay connected, book a viewing session, or support this valuable community project. More information and bookings can be found at oxford.ngawhetu.nz or on Facebook under Oxford Observatory.

Use It or Lose It

Modern life makes many things easier, but convenience often comes at a cost. Rely too much on a calculator and mental maths fades. Follow GPS everywhere and your sense of direction weakens. Drive for every short trip and walking becomes harder. Tools are useful, but the less we practise our own abilities, the more we lose them. Sometimes doing things the harder way is how we stay capable.
